But the masses are more accuracy influenced by an idea personified and intensified in an individual. This is an age in which ideas rule. But men have been cowardly in their expression of ideas. We are accustomed to say that we live under the government of public opinion. We turn to the dream of the The little girl had on a nest light called dress, and a sit seleved wifte apron, revealing the prettiest-stitle arms you can imagine; her eyes were blue as a forget me-not on the banks of the Rhine, her hair was lint white, but fine and silky—her tint was the crimson-and-white of the bonnie wee daisy—she had a tiny straw bonnet on her tiny head, and it would keep slipping down from the back of her little pate, and she kept pulling if on again with one-hand, white holding her flowers tight in the other little first; in a word her tout ensemble fairly bewitched me.

We turn to the dream of the Hindoo, who in vision saw mankind led out to its history. First appeared man, ourbed and with an iron bit in fits mouth, from which the reins went back to an iron hand. This was the government of despotism. The seene changed, and he saw man lead by threads proceeding from the brain, and going back to an invisible hand. This was the government of ideas. When Philip wrote to Aristotle that sublime letter which has floated down to us across the ages, he said, "I thank the Divinity not so much that he has given me Alexander as that he has given him in a day when you can form him worthy to rule Macedonia." Every soul born within our country is an Alexander, and must be formed to rule worthly Macedonia.—When Madame de Stael, to flatter the Emperor Alexander, said to him, "You, Sire, are a Constitution," he replied, "No, Madem, I am but a happy accident." Here we have no such happy accidents, Where are the schools in which these sovereigns are to be formed! Where is the mould in which this public opinion is to be run! The age of statesmen is over, the age of bullets is over, and the age of the printing press has come. What the invention of gunpowder was to the art of war, making any man who could pull a trigger equal to the most powerful warrior, the press is in a reading age. We have invented the pamphiet. We have called into existence the fourth estate of the realm, it is brains. Men sometimes think that the great brows at Washington control the nation. So the boy who first sees a steamboat, thinks that the walking beam is the propelling power, but below there is a "fanatic" feeding the fires. Lake Street. . . 66 Chambers, of the present day? We have a subject in our midst which illustrates its spirit, and, although the instance is a homely one, yet a yardstick of Yankee pine will do as well as one of bronze, if it be of the right length. That subject is spiritualism. Suppose it an error; yet there are errors, says Coleridge, which ho wise man will treat with rudeness while there is a possibility that they may be the retraction of some great truth yet below the borizon. While the people are wandering about in a mist of facts or supposed facts, where is science? Why does she not light her torch and say, "this is the way, here lies truth, and here lies error." A scholar known throughout the world goes to Albany and asks a convention of scientific men to give it an investigation, and they cover Dr. Hare with ridicule. As a farther illustration of the cowardies of the scholarship of the present day, the orator referred to Edward Everett, who, underiging in this age to tell the story of Washington's life, an age when, if ever Washington and a claim upon the gratitude of his country, it is that living in a Slave State he rose above surrounding prejudices, and left upon record the most eloqueut protests against the great crime of Virginia; yet this American scholar remembers only to forget that he ever intered a word against slavery.

[A few hisses were heard upon the delivery of this passage, which were quickly lost in a sterm of applause.]
